

What are Autism Spectrum Disorders?

Autism is considered to be a spectrum disorder, meaning that the symptoms and characteristics of autism can present themselves in a wide variety of combinations, from mild to severe. This is why the term “autism spectrum disorder” (ASD) is sometimes used. Although autism is defined by a set of specific behaviors, children and adults can exhibit any combination of them with any degree of severity.

ASD includes Autism, PDD-NOS and Asperger’s Syndrome.

More than 4 million people in the U.S. have some form of autism, and over 72,000 in South Carolina. The newest prevalence rate now places autism as one of the three most common developmental disabilities, much more common than Down Syndrome. Yet the majority of the public, including some professionals in medical, educational and vocational fields are still unaware of how autism affects behavior. Progress is being made in developing more effective teaching methods and other interventions for individuals with autism.

Case Management

Enhancing lives of individuals with ASD

What is Case Management?

Case Management Services are intended to assure that individuals who are eligible for SCDDSN services have access to a full array of necessary services that will enable them to live in community settings rather than in institutional settings. Case Management Services are provided by trained professionals, called Case Managers, who have knowledge of the medical, social, educational, and other services that are available. Case Managers learn about each individual's specific needs, through assessment, so that he/she may plan for and facilitate the delivery of specific services to meet those needs. Case Managers assure that services are appropriate and effective and, as needed, make referrals and/or link people to appropriate service providers.
